Frederic Henry Pease (1839-1909) was born in Farmington, Ohio, son of a founder of Oberlin College. Showing talent as a singer and on the violin, he attended a nearby singing school as a child. He paid for his textbook by working a neighbor's plough-horse. He was educated at Oberlin and left to accompany E. M. Foote, holding musical conventions. He spent time studying in Boston and settled in Ypsilanti, Michigan. He was appointed professor of music at Michigan State Normal School, holding that position until his death. At Michigan State, he established the Conservatory of Music. He held organist positions in Jackson, Detroit and Ypsilanti. He also taught courses at the Detroit Conservatory, worked with the Bay View Festival and conducted at the National Summer School at Chicago. He wrote and compiled music for progressive musical education. His compositions include minor works and choral pieces.

Brightly shine the gems of India,
And the yellow gold is bright;
Sparkling is the diamond's lustre,
And the pearl is purely white;
But more precious, brighter jewels
Than in distant climes we find,
Far more worthy of our keeping,
Are the jewels of the mind.

Learning gains what gold can never,
Virtue's purer than the pearl;
And man's genius flashes brighter
Than the diamond of an Earl:
Fortune gives to few her favors,
But our brows we all may bind,
If we labor well and truly,
With the jewels of the mind.
